The rise and fall of the Old Kingdom—Dynasty 0 to Dynasty 6	Emergence of Greek City states—the archaic period	The Late Republic—from the Gracchi to Sulla
Source 1: line drawing of the material remains of an ancient ceremonial macehead, popularly named the Scorpion Macehead, found at Heirokonpolis and dated to the very earliest period of Egyptian history. Its subject matter is debatable as it may show an irrigation project but it may show a part of the unification process of the Egyptian state. Source 2: an ancient written source by the Greek historian Herodotus discussing aspects of the governance of Egypt by Sneferu and Khufu and the construction of Khufu's pyramid at Giza. Source 3: a modern diagram showing an interpretation of the various stages in the construction of Djoser's Step Pyramid at Saqqara. This is the interpretation of a deceased 20th century Egyptologist. Source 4: a modern written source by the practising Egyptologists Stephen Quirke and Jeffrey Spencer, discussing changes in pyramid building, religious building and governance in Dynasties 4 and 5. Source 5: an ancient inscribed autobiographical source from the tomb of the Dynasty 6 Vizier Harkhuf at Aswan, outlining his military and commercial activities on behalf of the central government and, in particular, his Pharaoh.	Source 1: ancient source by the Greek historian Herodotus, discussing the creation of the colony of Platea by the Therans referring to the reasons and the process undertaken. Source 2: ancient source by the reformer Solon, discussing his social and political reforms, particularly citizenship and debt law. Source 3: ancient source by the Roman historian Strabo, discussing the creation of a new class within Spartan society, as well as citizenship and the creation of a Spartan colony. Source 4: ancient source written by the Greek philosopher Aristotle discussing tyranny and governance. Source 5: ancient source written by the Greek biographer Plutarch, outlining the political reforms of Sparta by Lycurgus.	Source 1: ancient source written by Appian, discussing the murder of Roman magistrates, beginning with the tribune Tiberius Gracchus, and the civil unrest that resulted. Source 2: modern source written by the historian Scullard discussing the murder of the tribune Gaius Gracchus, focussing, on the reasons for his murder and the tensions his reforms created. Source 3: ancient source from the political pamphlet writer Sallust discussing the election of Marius to consul and the transference of the command against Jugurtha to Marius. Source 4: modern source by Goldsworthy that states that Marius was responsible for subsequent civil wars. Source 5: ancient source written by the Greek biographer Plutarch during the Roman Empire discussing the dictatorship of Sulla and the use of violence.

The rise and fall of the Old Kingdom—Dynasty 0 to Dynasty 6	Emergence of Greek City states—the archaic period	The Late Republic from the Gracchi to Sulla
Source 1: the one third that remains of this ceremonial macehead indicates that at the very earliest stages of Egyptian history there was a stratified society, with the most prominent figure wearing the White Crown of Upper Egypt, and emphasises his importance, he is engaged in some sort of water-associated work or ritual. Accompanying him are representations of the important universal gods Seth, Horus and one of the jackal gods, as well as representations of foreigners and of the Lower Egyptian state. This could indicate a unified state. Source 2: Herodotus is indicating the differences in personality and governance style of Sneferu the good and Khufu the bad; as well as the enormity of the task of building the Great Pyramid and the toll that it took on both men and supplies. Source 3: Edwards draws a representation of the construction techniques of Djoser's Step Pyramid; indicating that it was built in a number of stages; starting with a mastaba and ending with a pyramid. Source 4: Quirke and Spencer indicate that the lack of enormous pyramids after Dynasty 4 need not indicate a reduction in the centralised power of the state. Source 5: Harkhuf, in promoting his own exploits undertaken on behalf of the central government, presents Egypt in Dynasty 6, at the very end of the Old Kingdom, as a strong, viable state.	Source 1: Herodotus' account highlights the conflict existing in city states and hints at the necessity of creating colonies in Archaic Greek times. It also refers to political conventions such as the use of lot. Source 2: Solon congratulates himself on his reforms suggesting he has created a better system. He implies the previous system was unjust and that he has saved Athens which he also exalts. Source 3: Strabo suggests that the Spartans treated their citizens harshly if they did not uphold the Spartan code i.e. refusing to fight for the state. The punishment for this was the loss of their citizenship, the men were enslaved and their children were considered inferior. The source is very negative towards this new class. Source 4: Aristotle looks favourably on the Peistratus tyranny as being benevolent and exercising sound governance. He refers to the widespread support for this tyranny from all sectors of society. Source 5: Plutarch views Lycurgus' reforms favourably; they lead to good governance being secure and sensible. He compares this with the previous system which was unstable. His view of democracy is negative. Support all points with quotes/references.	Source 1: Appian views the death of Tiberius as a dangerous precedent that resulted in violence becoming the norm in dealing with political tensions in Rome. He states that innocent Romans were also killed during these events. Source 2: Scullard identifies the blame for Gaius' death as being due to Gaius' own temperament as well as the reactionary nature of the Senate. He places more weight on the immoral act of the Senators, whilst Gaius is portrayed as a genuine reformer. Source 3: Sallust shows disdain for the Roman people, depicting them as weak and easily manipulated by immoral politicians. He views the individual candidates as having merit though he does show sympathy for Marius. Source 4: Goldsworthy attempts a balanced portrayal of Marius—he depicts Marius, has a brilliant general but in later years as a flawed politician. He also seems to wish to redeem Marius the general from negative renditions that downplayed the threat to Rome of the northern tribes. Source 5: Plutarch's emotive language presents a negative view of Sulla stating his unethical political actions were more loathsome than his immoral private life. Support all points with quotes/references.

The rise and fall of the Old Kingdom—Dynasty 0 to Dynasty 6	Emergence of Greek City states—the archaic period	The Late Republic—from the Gracchi to Sulla
Student must make specific links between the sources and the major trends/movements where applicable. These include: * political change—centralisation/decentralisation of the state • religious change • pyramid building • funerary customs and beliefs • language and writing • military and commercial interaction with neighbours/expansion of boundaries • art and architecture • technology.	Student must make specific links between the sources and the major trends/movements. These include: • stasis • colonisation • tyranny • political reform • economic reform • citizenship • social class tensions.	Student must make specific links between the sources and the major trends/movements. These include: • the rise of the tribunate • extraordinary commands • violence as a political tool • constitutional changes • social classes tensions • political factions • the expansion of the empire.

Question 2

(A) Identify the events and/or issues related to conflict and/or resolution which are depicted in the three sources.

(6 marks)*

Dynastic Struggles and Empire—Tutmosis II, Tutmosis III and Hatshepsut	The conflict between the Greeks and Persia 511–479 BC	From Pompey to the emergence of Augustus in 27 BC
Source 1: this ancient inscription on the walls of the temple of Deir el Bahari regarding the god Khnum's part in the conception of Hatshepsut refers to the wish or need of Hatshepsut to legitimise her position as pharaoh and thus fabricate the evidence to support her position of power or shore up her factional power base, while her stepson, the legitimate pharaoh, was a minor. Source 2: Tyledsley highlights the rapidity with which Hatshepsut faded from the historical record. Thus despite her claims on the walls of Deir el Bahari (Djeser–Djeseru) and despite the considerable building, trading and military achievements of her reign, she was an interloper and was ultimately treated as such by those she had sought to dominate and those who came later. She was not born to be pharaoh, she was a woman, and although she was the daughter of a pharaoh and the wife of a pharaoh, she did not bear a son. Her daughter, although betrothed to a pharaoh, died while still very young. Although Hatshepsut's monuments were not desecrated immediately after her death, they certainly were a relatively short time later. Source 3: the pyramid on the top of Hatshepsut's fallen obelisk at Karnak shows and reaffirms Hatshepsut at the height of her powers, supported by the all-powerful god Amun, wearing the blue war crown and portrayed as a male, thus underscoring her right to rule. The existence of the obelisk itself is a potent expression of her power, given the resources needed to construct, move and then erect it at Karnak. This is normal pharaonic activity and could show, depending on the point of view, issues related to either conflict or resolution.	Source 1: refers to the creation of the Hellenic League in 481 BC in response to the Persian threat being mounted by Xerxes. This includes previously warring states. Source 2: refers to the liberation of the Ionians (Greek descendents living in Asia minor) from the control of the Persian Empire after the defeat of Xerxes by the Hellenic League. Source 3: refers to the victory of the Greeks over the Persians in 479 BC on the mainland of Greece.	Source 1: refers to the rise of Pompey and the issue of private/client armies. Pompey's meteoric rise is attributed to his assistance of Sulla. Source 2: refers to the growing conflict between Pompey and Caesar. Curio, Caesar's tribune in Rome, is depicted as being antagonistic to Pompey. Source 3: refers to Caesar's actions after the defeat of Pompey at Pharsalus. Caesar seeks to end conflict not through more warfare but by offering clemency to key members of Pompey's faction.

(b) In what ways do the viewpoints of the sources differ?*

(6 marks)

Dynastic Struggles and Empire–Tutmosis II, Tutmosis III and Hatshepsut	The conflict between the Greeks and Persia 511–479 BC	From Pompey to the emergence of Augustus in 27 BC
Source 1: - The inscription quoted here and cited later in Naville and Tyldesley would have been authorised by Hatshepsut herself. It is on the walls of her mortuary temple. - The viewpoint here is that she was not only born to rule but that she was conceived to rule. That her conception was authorised by the creator god Khnum who mythology tells us shaped the bodies of humans on his potter's wheel. It explicitly states that she is a woman and at the same time a King and that such is the will of the god. Source 2: - Tyldesley tells us that she was powerful only in her own time. The implication is that as a powerful woman she must have been some kind of a threat, a challenge or an issue that could only be dealt with by ignoring the fact that she had existed, given that 'more ephemeral Tutmoside Princesses' remain in the record. - So, the anomaly that she was, a powerful royal woman with the position and trappings of a male pharaoh, meant that after her death she ceased ever to have existed, both officially and unofficially. The King Lists and the record of the Festival of Min exclude her. The tombs of greater and lesser nobility and of the artisans excluded her immediately after her death, as well as later. Source 3: - Again, Hatshepsut would have authorised the construction, transportation and erection of the obelisk at the Karnak temple. She is shown at the height of her powers; she is shown as a warrior pharaoh with her war crown being placed on her head by the most powerful of the gods. - Here Hatshepsut rules by the right of power and by the right of recognition by the most powerful of the gods. Like Elizabeth 1, she played the role of a man and in her lifetime controlled the resources of the state.	Source 1: - Herodotus is an ancient source who looks on the creation of the Hellenic League as a momentous event. - He writes from the perspective of the Greeks. Source 2: - Aeschylus, the playwright, is an ancient source. This is a literary interpretation of the Greek victory over the Persians. - It highlights the outcome from the Ionian perspective. It sees the victory at Salamis as the beginning of a new period of freedom from Persian oppression. It doesn't refer to who brought about the resolutions. Source 3: - Is a modern interpretation of the victory of the Hellenic League on the Greek mainland. - It differs from Source 2 in suggesting the victory over the Persians was only the beginning and that having resolved the conflict in Greece, the Hellenic League, referred to in Source 1, turned to the liberation of Ionia. This defensive war then became an offensive war.	Source 1: - This is an ancient source focussing on the role of civil wars in bring the decline of the republic. - Appian views the rise of client armies as integral for origins of civil wars and places some of the responsibility for the rise of Pompey on Sulla. Source 2: - This letter is an ancient source that identifies Pompey's fear of Caesar's military prestige and thus is similar to Source 1. - However it highlights the political manoeuvres within Rome prior to the civil war. Source 3: - Is a modern account that focuses on the role of Caesar in bringing peace to Rome. - As with Source 2, it focuses on the political solution, depicting Caesar as a skilful politician, rather than on military means. It humanises Caesar by referring to his affection for Brutus.

(c) Explain how useful the sources are in gaining an understanding of the key events and/or issues of the period.

(13 marks)

Dynastic Struggles and Empire–Tutmosis II, Tutmosis III and Hatshepsut	The conflict between the Greeks and Persia 511–479 BC	From Pompey to the emergence of Augustus in 27 BC
Typically student answers may include the following and should make direct reference to the sources: - The sources refer to the reign of the Pharaoh Hatshepsut who was the daughter of Tutmosis I, the wife of Tutmosis and the stepmother of Tutmosis III. She had been married to her brother as his Great Royal Wife and bore him a daughter, but his son was the offspring of one of the concubines or lesser wives. Hatshepsut married or betrothed their daughter Neferure to her half brother, but the girl died young. - Tutmosis II had died when his son was still a child and Hatshepsut obviously had the factional backing to make a claim for the throne, nominally power sharing with her stepson but apparently in reality as the sole repository of power. - Commonly, women did not rule in Egypt, although they possessed considerably more rights and freedoms than their sisters in other parts of the ancient world—thus Hatshepsut's need to claim divine intervention in as many aspects of her life as possible; to underscore the legitimacy of her position. - Hatshepsut also underscored her position with an amazing building program—in particular the incredibly beautiful temple of Deir el Bahari in which she had inscribed her religious, political, foreign policy and commercial successes. (approx 9 marks) Usefulness: Without these buildings we would be hard pushed to find the evidence to pull together the threads of this period of history because she was indeed written out of the official historical record and to a large extent ignored by the unofficial record too. - The graffiti found in the tomb and its passageways beneath her temple, the defacing of her monuments and their walling up when defacing was not possible, all underscore the questions which hang over her period of power.	Typically student answers may include the following and should make direct reference to the sources: - The sources refer to the Hellenic League and its victory over Persia. Collectively they give the impression that the League was characterised by unity and was ultimately victorious. - The Greeks formed the Hellenic League in 481 BC putting aside their conflicts. The Spartans provided the land commander, Leonidas, and the navarch, Eurybiades although the fleet itself was dominated by the Athenians. This was because the Athenians, such as Themistocles, deferred their leadership to maintain unity. - Unity was important and was used most effectively at Plataea when Pausanias lead the Greek forces against Mardonius in 479 BC. - Aeschylus' account suggests that Salamis was the point at which the Persians were defeated and the Ionians liberated, however the war continued after this battle. - Ehrenberg's account highlights the idea that the end of the war in Greece Indeed the Persians had been defeated in Greece 10 years previously and had returned. The Athenians, who shared kinship with the Ionians, wished to pursue the war with the Persians to Asia and liberate the Greeks under Persian control. Whilst the Hellenic League initially continued to be involved, the Spartans returned after Mycale. Whilst the Peloponnesian states permanently returned to Greece, Athens continued to pursue the war. (approx. 9 marks) Usefulness: The sources however only offer a snapshot from the time period and all focus on the Greek/Ionian viewpoint. - And the Greeks were not always unified in their strategy and pre-existing conflicts were exposed. This is best seen at the second congress at the isthmus when the League, dominated by Peloponnesian states, voted to retreat. Themistocles used duplicitous methods to ensure	Typically student answers may include the following and should make direct reference to the sources: - The sources refer to the conflict between Pompey and Caesar. Fundamental to this was the growth of client armies which were loyal to generals rather than the SPQR. Both Pompey and Caesar had large armies who had campaigned with them for years (Pompey's in Spain and the East; Caesar's in Gaul) and they were incredibly loyal. - Another element discussed is the relationship between tribunes and generals which goes to the core of power and authority. - Pompey's actions during this time period seem contradictory. For example, whilst he introduced legislation that all candidates for elections must appear in person he subsequently made an exception for Caesar. - Attempts at reconciliation were also made by Curio on Caesar's behalf, such as the senatorial vote requiring both Caesar and Pompey to give up their commands and disarm which were supported 370 to 22 votes. The inflammatory actions of the optimates faction and in particular Marcellus and Metellus Scipio. - Holland does recognise that a purely military victory would not reconcile the opposing factions. During the civil war, Caesar criss-crossed the empire, defeating his opponents on the battlefields, but also spent time in Rome attempting to reconcile fundamental tensions within the SPQR. Caesar's use of the dictatorship to achieve these aims inflamed his opponents within the Senate and legitimised their continued armed conflict. Holland highlights that Caesar believed that clemency would undercut his opponents and end the conflict. However this resolution was short-lived as Brutus ultimately betrayed Caesar and this returned Rome to civil war. (approx. 9 marks)

Dynastic Struggles and Empire–Tutmosis II, Tutmosis III and Hatshepsut	The conflict between the Greeks and Persia 511–479 BC	From Pompey to the emergence of Augustus in 27 BC
- There are a variety of interpretations of this period. That Hatshepsut held power against the wishes of her stepson or that she gradually shared power with him as he grew, put him in charge of her armies, and handed power over to him as he came of age. The record to date is tantalisingly silent on much of this—what we do know is that before his death he had started to obliterate her memory. Why we cannot be sure and again there are a number of theories related to religion and power towards the end of Tutmosis III's reign. - Certainly this period offers more questions than answers. The sources tell us about Hatshepsut's quest for legitimacy and its ultimate failure. They do not tell us about the events of her reign or of the events of Tutmosis III's reign. - They do not tell us about Tutmosis III's activities against Hatshepsut's monuments towards the end of his reign. (4 marks for discussion of usefulness)	the Hellenic League fought at Salamis, by suggesting Athens would abandon Greece and move to Italy. (4 marks for discussion of usefulness)	Usefulness: None of the sources discuss the military conflict itself, the defeat of Pompey at Pharsalus and the murder of Pompey. (4 marks for discussion of usefulness)

SECTION TWO: Essay

This section has TWO parts. Each part has THREE questions.

Note 1:

Students attempt ONE (1) question only from Part A using the context from 2A. Students attempt ONE (1) question only from Part B using the context from 2B.

Note 2:

The following marking guide is generic and thus is suitable for all of the alternative questions available to students in Section Two.

Note 3:

It is expected that markers would assign marks holistically using the following criteria to assist them in assigning a range of marks.
