ANCIENT HISTORY SAMPLE EXAMINATION STAGE 3

SECTION ONE: DOCUMENT STUDY

QUESTION ONE:

- a) Identify and give reasons for the changes and/or continuities referred to in Sources 1 to 4. (8 marks)*

Dynasty 19: The beginnings of the End – Ramses I, Seti I and Ramses II	Athenian democracy and empire	Augustus from 44BC to AD14
	Source 1: Change to the tribal system of Cleisthenes to break the power of the original four tribes and their influence over the political system. This system fine tuned Solon's reforms and lasted through the time period. Source 2: Pericles' reform to the citizenship in 451BC reduced the number of people eligible for payment for office and jury service. Source 3: The Great Panathenaea Festival in the 440s required all members of the empire to send a delegation and a donation. This reinforces Athena as the chief goddess for each member state and served as propaganda. OR Source 3: The building program began in the 440s to restore buildings destroyed in the Persian Wars, to reduce unemployment and	Source 1: This refers to changes Augustus made to marriage laws as part of his program of social and moral regeneration. Augustus wished to restore public morality, encourage marriage and family life especially amongst the upper classes and ensure the dominance of the Italian stock within the empire. Source 2: Augustus initiated a significant building program, including the Augustan Forum, aqueducts and temples. The program was aimed at constructing a city worthy of being the capital but also served to promote the prestige of Augustus family and associates. Source 3: Augustus reign saw a significant increase in the patrician class and the citizenry both of which were awarded to those who supported him during the civil war. Citizenry

Source 4: The Chalcis Decree represents the harsh imperialistic policy that had been unfolding during the time period, this is most likely a response to rebellion amongst the allies.	also increased as a result of the expansion of the empire and the culmination of his moral and social reforms. Source 4: Augustus created a constitutional settlement that secured his power but avoided the use of titles such as dictator which had aggravated the SPQR and led to Julius Caesar's assassination.

- b) To what extent do these sources reflect the significant changes and/or continuities evident in the period of study represented.
(12 marks)

Dynasty 19: The beginnings of the End – Ramses I, Seti I and Ramses II	Athenian democracy and empire	Augustus from 44BC to AD14
	The sources refer to political reform and the increasingly harsh treatment of the allies. These are two significant changes during the time period. Cleisthenes reforms began the process of introducing democracy in Athens. There are questions as to whether the power of the tribes diminished. The sources do not show the significant changes introduced by Ephialtes and Pericles i.e. removing power from the Areopagus and distributing it amongst the Boule and the Assembly; the creation of the dikesteria, payment of officials and jurors.	The sources refer to the social and political reforms of Augustus. Augustus reigned for over 40 years and during this time introduced a suite of reforms to address the problems of the Late Republic. The sources refer to his constitutional settlements which were arguably the most significant change as effectively Augustus was the SPQR holding the traditional powers of a consul, a censor, a general and a tribune. He was in essence an emperor guiding the other magistrates, however the title was not used during his reign. Similarly he secured the political succession of his heir through promotion

	Simultaneous to this was the growth of the empire throughout the Aegean which is not directly referred to in the sources. This was very important as the wealth generated from this was necessary to fund the democratic reforms. Thus it became imperative to hold onto the allies, a point which is referred to in Source 4. The sources do not show the extent to which Athens controlled her allies. Force was not the only mechanism Athens used to control her allies, aspects such as the Panathenaea Festival were useful tools to create unity. The influx of foreigners into Athens as a consequence of the growth of the empire also created some problems and further strains on the payment of officials thus Pericles cut the citizen list to reduce those eligible. Whilst the sources do reflect significant changes they do not show the extent of the empire or how Athens was able to gain the empire.	during their life time as the title of Caesar was not hereditary. In effect the SPQR became dependent on Augustus. The sources also refer to changes made to the orders in an attempt to redress the tensions of the late republic, particularly the equestrian class. Another key change not referred to, but which significantly changed the dynamic in the empire, were to the army. Augustus reduced the number of soldiers settling the veterans across the empire which assisted with Romanisation. He also introduced regular pay which ensured that the loyalty of the army was to Rome (or more accurately the emperor as the embodiment of the empire). This prevented civil war in the future, although it did lead to future emperors being selected by the army.

c) What problems do these sources present for the historian in her/his analysis of the time period represented? (5 marks)

QUESTION TWO:

a) In what ways do the viewpoints differ between the sources in relation to the people to which reference is made? (6 marks)*

The Amarna 'Revolution' from Amenhotep III to Horemheb	The Peloponnesian War – 445 to 404BC	The Julio Claudians – Tiberius to Nero
	- Both sources refer to Pericles, the leading Greek strategos through to 429BC - Source 1 is a positive representation which highlights the good governance of Pericles. It portrays him as a benevolent statesman who guides the demos through their decisions. - Source 2 is more critical of Pericles. It identifies that whilst Pericles was considerable politician early in his career as he grew older he became more stubborn. It states that Pericles was an individual out of step with the demos who did not value reason above religion. Kagan depicts the career of Pericles as being inseparable and parallel to the career of Athens as a great empire. Support all points with quotes/references	-Both sources refer to Tiberius who was Caesar between AD14 and 37. -Source 1 is a negative representation of Tiberius depicting him as evil, manipulative, cruel and unworthy of the title Caesar. - Source 2 is more favourable of Tiberius. Whilst not denying that he was ineffectual Syme portrays a leader who had a genuine desire to solve the problems of Rome but was hindered by events outside his control. Syme also attributes the failures of Tiberius as being significantly due to the work of his predecessor, Augustus. Support all points with quotes/references

b) Account for the differences in the perspectives in Source 1 and 2. (6 marks)*

The Amarna 'Revolution' from Amenhotep III to Horemheb	The Peloponnesian War – 445 to 404BC	The Julio Claudians – Tiberius to Nero
	Source 1 is written by Thucydides, an Athenian strategos during the Peloponnesian War. Thucydides' History clearly attributes the failure of the Athenians in the war as due in a large degree to the fickle and unreasonable actions of the demos. He	Source 1 is written by Tacitus, who was a member of the senate during the bloody reign of Domitian. Many of his friends and colleagues were killed during this time and this had a significant influence on his writing. Tacitus is clearly biased against Tiberius, writes so that all in the future can heed the lessons. Thucydides bias is linked to his ostracism after the loss of Amphipolis and his dislike of Cleon and other demagogues Source 2 is written by the modern historian Kagan who has used a range of ancient sources to construct his perspective. His scepticism of the emphasis on religion by the demos seems to reflect the 20th century mentality of rationalism.	attributing many of the tyrannical aspects of Domitian's reign to his Tiberius, particularly maiestas. Source 2 is written by Syme a modern historian who critiques Tacitus using a variety of ancient sources. Rather than presume that Tiberius was always evil Syme attempts to identify what lead Tiberius to act in this way and at what point he began to be corrupted.

- c) To what extent do these sources accurately represent the significance of the individual represented within the period of study?
(13 marks)

The Amarna 'Revolution' from Amenhotep III to Horemheb	The Peloponnesian War – 445 to 404BC	The Julio Claudians – Tiberius to Nero
	Both sources highlight Pericles as a statesman whose control over the demos was vital for the functioning of Athens. Pericles was a key individual during this time period, even after his death in 429BC. Source 1 specifically refers to the events in 430BC after the second invasion of Attica by Sparta and the outbreak of the plague when the Athenians wished to sue for peace. However Thucydides continually refers to the guidance of Pericles throughout his History. This included the policy of periesesthai however some modern historians have been more circumspect on the viability of this policy. Pericles influence was seen prior to the	Both sources refer to Tiberius, the first of the emperors. Tiberius' influence has been debated by historians, partly due to the influence of the ancient sources: Tacitus, Suetonius and Dio Cassius. Tiberius may not have been like by the sections of the community such as the senate, the nobility but it is important to distinguish his personality from his achievements. Tiberius chose to continue many of the policies of Augustus which contributed to the peace and prosperity of Rome. He monitored the public finances cutting down on extravagant building projects and gladiatorial shows, whilst ensuring food

	Peloponnesian War with his democratic reforms, and imperial policy prior to this time period in question. The period 444BC to 429 is referred to as Periclean Athens by modern historians and includes the famous building program. However his pre-eminence generated opposition who chose not to attack Pericles directly (after the failed attempt by Thucydides in 447) but via his friends. This is alluded to in Source 2. Aspasia, Pheidias and Anaxagoras all had religious charges brought against them in an attempt to embarrass and discredit Pericles. Pericles influence is viewed positively by Thucydides however ancient sources such as Aristophanes, and modern historians such as Hornblower and Kagan, show that on occasions Pericles' stubborn streak had devastating implications such as his failure to revoke the Megarian decree – which is spark for the Peloponnesian War. Thucydides attributes the ultimate failure of Athens in the Peloponnesian War as due to the demagogues who followed Pericles and departed from his wise strategy. Thus Pericles domestic and foreign policy were incredibly significant on the course of events during this time period.	shortages were alleviated for the poorer classes, establishing a loan fund and relief after the Aventine fire.. Tiberius attempted to work with the senate upholding traditional rights and refusing special honours, however the senate had become subservient under Augustus rule as indicated by Syme. This may be attributed to the increased use of maiestas or the influence of Sejanus. Tiberius wished to maintain peace within the empire and settled disputes fairly with diplomacy as much as possible (despite being an excellent general). He did not wish to expand the empire unnecessarily, and this could be partly the reason for his conflict with Germanicus rather than jealousy (as believed by Tacitus). Ancient sources emphasise the partnership with Sejanus who was supported by the praetorian guard, the court intrigues and the use of maiestas when discussing the reign of Tiberius. They also imply that Germanicus was a more worthy successor to Augustus. However Tiberius reign provided a valuable period of stability for the young Principate.
